

How to get better creative work from your agencies

- 1. Tame the Crazy-makers. Julia Cameron's word. Each company has them. Self-important Tasmanian devils who frenzy into rooms, thrust their status at people, and leave.
- 2. Don't brief and run. Don't phone in a brief. Don't brief and then disappear for two weeks. Think. Take responsibility. Or write the brief with your agency.
- 3. Reveal the decision-makers. Don't play games. When people know how decisions happen they can prepare for them. And work with the decision-makers.
- 4. Avoid team sprawl. Good talent flees team sprawl or they send people to sit and take the mess in the face while they stay in the office.
- 5. Bring the right people into the room. If people who don't do the work aren't in the room it's because your meetings aren't useful or the agency is keeping people out.
- 6. Learn your team. Take an interest in their side projects. Understand what they're into. Invite them to bring it into their work for you.
- 7. Reduce the drama. People who do the work and spend their late nights and weekends thinking about it don't need to waste time in meetings. Keep interactions straight forward.
- 8. Study "great work". Read case studies. Have more than "that one thing I did ten years ago" to refer to. Share examples of work you want people to beat.
- 9. Keep feedback short. You don't need to share every brain fart. Share feedback in one paragraph. Perhaps, answer: "What needs to happen to make this even better?"
- 10. Don't bore people. Most marketing plans start as copy-and-paste from last time. They are difficult to get signed off. We empathize. But keep briefings short